Accelerate business strategies

Overview

Applications and services power your business results. But most organizations cannot connect the strategic goals of their business units to specific underlying IT investments leading to application bloat and missed opportunities to fund growth initiatives. Organizations without dedicated ITFM stewardship face common challenges:

- Application total cost of ownership (TCO) initiatives do not easily identify addressable spend to optimize.
- Duplicate and underused applications cause portfolio bloat and lockout funds from new investments.
- Business units consume IT like it's free, leading to budget resource constraints.

Optimize application TCO

The majority of app portfolio spend goes to a select number of large applications. Reducing the total cost of the most expensive applications in an organization has an outsized impact on the application portfolio cost structure. These savings can then be applied to growth initiatives.

Rationalize your application and service portfolio

The addition of new applications is not always done in conjunction with evaluating available apps or the real business value these new apps provide. This can result in a lengthy list of applications that may be duplicative or simply under-utilized relative to their cost. Streamlining this portfolio unlocks investments for new opportunities.

Manage business unit consumption

A partnership between technology leaders and the business requires alignment between investments and associated business initiatives and objectives. Business units want to understand their IT cost structure, the associated value, and the levers they have to control. Controlling spend through consumption choices gives business units agency over their IT budget and deepens the partnership with IT.
